pancho villa &

her stories all so sharp, straight-out ("muy franca") as when Pancho Villa came to town, he strung the chinos up on lamp-posts, small business-men soon ran away to refuge in Los Angeles.

now 93 at the end of this month, she was 14 there in the clean streets of Chihuahua when,
on horse-back, Villa had her neighbor brought out into the daylight: "Ilévenmelo y mátelo" he ordered.

she never forgot.

they crossed the bridge, El Paso 1926, some tall gavacho, friend of the family, brought her, her cousin & her aunt into the U.S. & arranged papers & transportation...

she told me that she cried when she arrived & saw the poverty, dirt street ("142 steps" she always tells me) of La Loma, all the way up at the top of Chavez Ravine ("right there behind 3rd base" is where my brother-in-law points out their house had been).

up there on the hill ("you would have loved it, Don" she tells me) everybody always inviting each other over to taste some good menudo they'd cooked up or to show some quinceañera outfit...

on summer evenings they'd plug in a toca-discos into the main power-pole & dance (she loves to dance) & Lalo's voice

would counter-point the mariachis & norteñas, beer & home-made wine kept them all dancing.

she paid her house off with her years of work in garment-factories down all those many steps in that L.A. her husband would go off into to dance-halls & perhaps turn up much later on at City Jail, the neighbors all pitching in to go his bail.

the Black & Jewish ladies taught her English & she read newspapers & all kinds of magazines bilingually, when she spoke Spanish to her children, they'd always answer her in English.

years later on a summer evening we sat next to the stage, Arroyo Seco Park, and there was Lalo Guerrero, long craggy face & guayabera rounding out his grandfatherly form, just arrived from Albuquerque - I'd met him before, in Little Tokyo, wandering among orange cones & concrete barricades, baffled by complex traffic pattern in heavy construction, across the street from the New Otani, I'd helped him cross, so I introduced them, she looked up at him after so many years of listening to his records & idolizing him, the dances & schoolgirl memories came rushing up into her eyes with tears & he smiled down at her with real happiness at this small lady (almost 90 then), her proud face shining out as he walked up onto the stage & sang to us about the beloved community.
